Lilli Marbach has known great loves and many professional climaxes. Yet she is of the opinion that the best times are by no means over – an insight that is meant to give readers the courage to believe in their dreams. She concentrates completely on her greatest passion: writing.

Balbina von Buntschuh's dreary life as a widow is given a good shaking up when an unexpected inheritance comes her way. Not only can she call a completely run-down house her own, but to top it all there are a couple of squatters camping in it. She really ought to chuck them both out onto the street, but the students make her an offer she can't possibly turn down: together with some mates they want to help her with the renovation and then rent out the rooms at a fair price.

Balbina agrees to the plan. If, however, she had known of the mishaps, turmoil and setbacks littering the path to a happy ending, she would have thought twice about the whole project. After all, she isn't as young as she used to be! On the other hand, age has never been important unless you are a bottle of wine. When she then makes a surprising discovery, she is finally convinced of one thing: no matter how old you are, it is never too late for the best time of your life ...

For readers of Dora Heldt and Renate Bergmann.
